

EDITORIAL

Welcome to yet another edition of ELTAI literature Journal
This issue carries four research articles from varied areas of study.

Dr. Supriya Mandloi has contributed an article titled 'Reflections of O.P. Bhatnagar: Indian Sensibilities and Modernism', in which she opines that O.P. Bhatnagar represents the face of New Indian English Poetry with its concern for modern India and the pictographic realism with which he presents the metamorphosis of ideological revolution taking its giant strides in the new millennium. She supports the argument that the art of poetry for O.P. Bhatnagar is a self-conscious craft shaped and reshaped by constant practice-refined and retouched by way of the vision.

Sarada. P.V in her article titled 'Unveiling Traumatic Past: Expression and Exploration of Self through Trauma Narrative' discusses about Trauma theory in relation to transgender, people with terminal diseases and dalits. For her such discourses create open spaces of discussion on social alienation and the exploitation of the depressed class.

The paper titled 'A Study on Syntactic Errors Experienced by First-Graduate Students of English in the Selected Colleges of Coimbatore with Reference to Active and Passive Voice' does not generally find a space in literature journals but the specific buildup of the argument proposed by the writers P. Jayakumar and Dr. I. Ajit deserves special mention. As per the paper, the purpose of the study is to investigate the problems why the students keep on committing syntactic errors, and offer some recommendations and suggestions for the problems. They have made an investigation into the problems of the first-generation students and syntactic errors which they committed and faced in transformation forms of grammar especially in Active voice and Passive voice.

Dhanappa M Metri in his paper titled 'Employability- Skill Enhancement through the Study of English Literature'. He tries to hypothesize that the study of literature in general and English literature in particular is a treasure house of Employability Skills. The researcher strongly believes that it is high time the study of English literature made life and career-oriented while appreciating its beauty. Dear readers are requested to go through the papers and profit themselves. Happy reading!
